Excerpt from A Sermon, Preached at the Church in Brattle Square, on Sunday Morning, January, 19, 1840, on the Destruction of the Lexington by Fire, January 13th I feel confident, my friends, that I shall be meeting the state of your minds, as Well as obeying the dictate of my own feelings, if I take my subject this morning from real life, and gather my sermon, not so much from some passage of scripture, as from that sad and appalling calamity, the news of which a few days since filled all hearts with sorrow. During the last few weeks or months, our community has borne a melancholy resemblance to the scenes connected with the text. As messenger after messenger came unto Job, bringing him tale after tale of loss and disaster, of the swift destruction of his property, and the death, Violent and sudden, of those in whom his affections were bound up, even so has it been with us. Every week, every day almost, has been fraught with some sad intelligence. Scarcely have our minds recovered from the shock of one, ereanother story comes, borne on the wings of the wind, to rend our hearts, by the fearful images of suffering and sorrow it calls up. A city in the southern section of the republic, far off in its location, yet near to us in many social and commercial relations, is visited by pestilence and fire. Even as in Egypt of old, the voice of lamentation, mourning and woe goes up from every dwelling, for in almost every dwelling is one dead; and while disease is making these dwellings desolate, a conflagration buries them in ruins. Night after night, a...
