Excerpt from The Osmotic Pressure of Cane Sugar Solutions at 0 Dissertation The previous work at 0 was greatly beset with the difficulties of dilution¹ and thermometer effects;² the nature of these difficulties has been fully described on several occasions and need not be repeated here. When the present work was begun the trouble caused by dilution had been overcome, thus doing away with corrections of uncertain value, but the thermometer effects were still a source of much trouble. At the higher temperatures the thermometer effects had been overcome by the construction of a bath in which practically constant temperatures could be maintained for any required length of time. It is obvious that at unless resort is had to very expensive mechanical refrigeration, no such system³ of alternately heating and cooling of the bath as devised for the higher temperatures could be used.
