Memoir and biography in form; narrated in the first person. "In order for the character of a human being to reveal truly exceptional qualities, we must have the good fortune to observe its action over a long period of years." So begins French author Jean Giono's (1895 - 1970) tale of Elzéard Bouffier, whom the narrator had the good fortune to know over years. Written (French title: L'homme qui plantait des arbres) in French but first published in English, 1953; this is a re-issue of 1985 w/woodcuts by Michael McCurdy. Gov't authorities attribute the forest growth to bizarre natural phenomenon, and the more than 10,000 people that move there know no more. And so it was, this account was penned --- ignorance dispelled, it did elicit friends to protect and honor a forest. The work was adapted to film by Frédéric Back and received an Academy Award for Best Animated...
